

AVRASYA

İNCELEMELERİ

MERKEZİ

CENTER FOR

EURASIAN STUDIES

SATELLITE IMAGES SHOW ANCIENT IRAQ TEMPLE DESTROYED

- 10.06.2016

Al Arabiya, 09 June 2016

Satellite images confirm the destruction of the ancient Nabu temple in Iraq, the UN said late Wednesday, after the ISIS group claimed to have blown it up.

The UN training and research agency UNITAR said it had analysed satellite images collected on June 3 over the ancient Assyrian city of Nimrud in northern Iraq.

Compared to imagery collected 12 January 2016, we observe extensive damage to the main entrance of what is known as Nabu Temple, the agency said, providing the two sets of satellite images.

In its latest attack on a historic site under its control, ISIS released a video this week claiming to have blown up the 2,800-year-old temple, devoted to the Babylonian god of wisdom.

The video showed shots of an information sign at the temple followed by a massive explosion. One of the extremists in the film also threatened to blow up the Egyptian pyramids and the Sphinx.

Nimrud, one of the jewels of the Assyrian era, was founded in the 13th century BC and lies on the Tigris River around 30 kilometres (18 miles) southeast of Mosul, Iraqs second city and the IS groups main hub in the country.

UNITAR said Nimrud was included in Iraqs Tentative List of sites which are likely to be nominated for inscription on UNESCOs World Heritage List.

It remained unclear when the ancient temple had been destroyed.

The ISIS foota	ige also	showed	bulldozers	destroying	the	Mashki	and	Nergal	gates	at	Nineveh,	near Mosul.

But Christopher Jones, an expert on Neo-Assyrian Empire who runs an archeology blog, pointed out that the extremist group had already previously released a photo essay showing the destruction of the Mashki gate, which he said had been bulldozed on April 10.

As for the Nergal gate, he said ISIS fighters had already chisled the face off an imposing granite Assyrian winged bull representing a lamassu, or an Assyrian protective deity, flanking the gate back in February.

This suggests that ISIS has gone back to re-destroy artifacts that it already destroyed once, in order to get footage for new videos, he wrote on his blog Wednesday.

In the ISIS extremists extreme interpretation of Islam, statues, idols and shrines amount to recognizing objects of worship other than God and must be destroyed.

The militants have systematically destroyed heritage sites in areas they control, including much of Syrias ancient city of Palmyra before they were chased out by Syrian regime troops in March.

Kaynak/Source: