EuroNews (24 March 2017)

A month before the first round of Frances presidential election, polls suggest 43 percent of voters are hesitant about who to vote for.

What do the polls suggest?

Independent centrist Emmanuel Macron and far-right leader Marine Le Pen are likely to lead in the first round of the election on April 23.

These two candidates would go through to a run-off on May 7 that Macron would easily win.

How many voters are undecided, though?

An Odoxa poll for French radio suggests 43 percent are still hesitating to choose between several of the candidates who are standing for election.

The uncertainty is being described as unprecedented in French electoral history.

The level of voter indecision about the candidates is completely exceptional, Odoxa said.

What else did the poll reveal?

Potential voters for the right-wing candidates □ Le Pen and conservative Francois Fillon □ were more settled in their choices than potential voters for Macron and the leading left-wing candidates Benoit Hamon of the governing Socialists and far-left firebrand, Jean-Luc Melenchon.

Potential voters who have already decided:

60% of Le Pens supporters

57% of Francois Fillons

47% of Emmanuel Macron

44% of Melenchon

40% for Hamon

The main points from the poll

74% of French say they will vote – fewer than 2012 or 2007 but more than 2002

Young people and those on low incomes more likely to abstain

43% still undecided on who to vote for

Emmanuel Macron is most popular with potential voters – 46% support.

The business

Investors have been jittery about the possibility of Le Pen, leader of the anti-European Union, anti-immigration National Front (Front National) winning the election and possibly taking France out of the euro.

What they are saying

If the election were held tomorrow, it would probably give a second round to Macron and Marine Le Pen, which is quite an interesting case because it would be the first time that the second round of the French presidential election involves two candidates not from the two biggest parties in France, said analyst Bruno Cautres from Sciences Po, Paris.
