PARIS (Reuters) - French President Emmanuel Macron on Monday hailed his EU peers decision to relocate the European Banking Agency (EBA) to Paris after Brexit as proof of the countrys attractiveness and a reward for its pro-Europe efforts.

Its a recognition of Frances attractiveness and European commitment, Macron said in a tweet.

Government spokesman Christophe Castaner said hosting the EBA, which is currently located in London, will bring tens of thousands of banking jobs to the French capital, which is competing with Frankfurt and other cities to attract London-based bankers.
