EU READIES 'DAVID DAVIS-PROOF' BREXIT SUMMIT

EU readies David Davis-proof Brexit summit

The European Union has played down talk by Britains Brexit minister that last weeks interim accord is not binding and will launch new talks on Friday (15 December) that are David Davisproof, a senior EU official said.

The comment on Tuesday followed Brexit Secretary Daviss weekend remark that outline divorce terms were more a statement of intent than legally binding.

The EU official told reporters that EU leaders meeting on Friday will ram home in guidelines to their negotiator that Britain must honor its agreements so far if it wants to discuss the future free trade treaty it wants.

Davis: UK won't pay Brexit bill if no trade deal agreed

Brexit Secretary David Davis said Sunday Britain will not honour financial commitments agreed this week with the European Union if they fail to secure a future trade deal, contradicting finance minister Philip Hammond.

Davis himself pledged to convert last Fridays deal into legal text as soon as possible after he spoke to the European Parliaments Brexit point man. Guy Verhofstadt branded Daviss earlier comment unhelpful and said that what the EU executive calls a gentlemans agreement must be made legal.

British and EU officials said that would mean agreeing the formal withdrawal treaty within the coming year so that it can be ratified by their parliaments before Brexit in March 2019.

Daviss EU counterpart, Michel Barnier, said he aimed in the new year to present a draft of a withdrawal treaty that would reflect the accords struck with Prime Minister Theresa May last week on settling financial obligations, the rights of expatriate citizens and ensuring no hard EU border with Northern Ireland.

Adding to the debate over how far London is bound by Mays deal, Barnier insisted there should be no backtracking if London is to have the trade negotiations it so much wants.

That is spelled out in legal language in the negotiating guidelines which leaders are expected to approve on Friday after May has left the summit: Negotiations in the second phase can only progress as long as all commitments undertaken during the first phase are respected in full and translated faithfully into legal terms as quickly as possible, the draft guidelines read.

That, the senior EU official said, made clear there could be no going back, as Davis had implied might be possible: The guidelines are David Davis-proof, the official said.

Guidelines were sent by summit chair Donald Tusk to the 27 other national leaders on Friday. They were little changed when their aides met on Monday to prepare the meeting, principally to spell out more clearly the timing of the next steps in the process and to emphasize continuing obligations on London.

An intention to start negotiating a transition period from Brexit to a future trade pact early in 2018 now includes a plan to be able to launch talks in January. The new draft makes clearer that talks on what happens after transition will start only after further guidelines are agreed in March.

Tusk, in his formal letter on Tuesday inviting leaders to the summit, warned there was no time to lose and highlighted a gnawing concern in Brussels that keeping divergent interests among the 27 in check may be much harder when it comes to a free trade treaty than it has been in settling Britains divorce.

This will be a furious race against time, where again our unity will be key, Tusk wrote. And the experience so far has shown that unity is a sine qua non of an orderly Brexit.
