The next meeting between Georgian Prime Ministers Special Envoy for Relations with Russia Zurab Abashidze and Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Grigory Karasin is scheduled for late February, the Russian Foreign Ministry said in a statement on Monday.

Earlier on Monday, the two diplomats agreed on the meeting in a phone conversation. "They discussed certain current issues of bilateral relations and agreed on the agenda for the next meeting scheduled for late February as part of an informal dialogue on the ways to normalize Russian-Georgian ties."

Earlier reports said the meeting would be held in late January.

Tbilisi severed diplomatic relations with Moscow in 2008 after Russia had recognized Abkhazias and South Ossetias independence. The Georgian Foreign Ministry said back then it would maintain consular relations with Russia. In November 2012, Georgias then Prime Minister Bidzina Ivanishvili established an office of prime ministers special envoy for relations with Russia and appointed diplomat Zurab Abarshidze, Georgias former ambassador to Russia in 2000-2004, to that post. On December 14, 2012, Abashidzes first meeting with Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Grigory Karasin took place in a Geneva suburb. It resumed direct dialogue between the two countries officials suspended after the 2008 developments. Further meetings were held in Prague, with the latest one taking place in October 2018.
