Our strategy is to make Georgia a regional hub for tourism, for international business, logistics, education and innovations, Prime Minister Mamuka Bakhtadze told the audience at the World Affairs Council in Seattle on June 7.

He said during the 28 years since Georgia gained independence from the Soviet Union, the country tried to tread its own democratic course as an independent nation.

"28 years ago, we started our path toward building institutions of democracy, creating a justice system that works as a representative accountable democracy. These reforms have also made Georgia one of the easiest places to do business, to invest in our country, our people, and our infrastructure. Step by step, we are becoming an economic hub for the region", he said.
