

AVRASYA
iNCELEMELERI
MERKEZI CENTER FOR
EURASIAN STUDIES

GOVERNMENT ALLY CONFIRMED TO ARMENIA'S CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

- 20.06.2019

Eurasianet (19 June 2019)

Armenias parliament has confirmed a judge with close ties with many of the new authorities to the countrys highest court. The move, which comes amid an effort to reform the judicial system in order to depoliticize it, led many to suggest that the government is instead repoliticizing it in their favor.

On June 18, Vahe Grigoryan was approved as a member of the Constitutional Court by a 99-22 vote in the National Assembly. Grigoryan is a long-time ally of many of the current leaders in the country, best known as the lawyer representing the survivors of the victims of the March 1 events, the violent breakup of protests against alleged election fraud in 2008.

Grigoryan also featured in a series of leaked phone calls from last year in which it appeared that Prime Minister Nikol Pashinyan was intervening in a politically sensitive legal case involving prosecutions of members of the former government. In one call, Sasun Kachatryan, the head of the Special Investigative Service, said that Grigoryan would make public statements in support of arresting the former officials.

At his confirmation hearing, Grigoryan acknowledged his close ties with the current authorities. I wont hide that I have friends in the My Step bloc, he said. Our friendship is founded on an ideological basis, and that ideological basis is not at all based on party ideology. It was founded on common dreams and common goals a free, democratic Armenia. Regardless of whether they are my friends or not, from the moment of being sworn in as a judge, a judge no longer has friends.

Some opposition MPs, however, raised concerns about Grigoryans politics. You said the constitutional court is a political body, if I understood it correctly, said Mane Tandilyan, a representative of the Bright Armenia bloc, referring to previously published comments Grigoryan had made. Then how do you imagine the decision made by a constitutional court judge to be impartial? she asked.

When I said it was the most political court, I meant that it produces the most political outcomes, he answered.

Grigoryan was the third candidate nominated by President Armen Sarkissian for the position, which had been open since last year, but the previous two were rejected by the new parliament and some suggested that they were effectively decoys.

Didnt Sarkissian know that both his candidates would be rejected by the National Assembly and that ultimately he would present Vahe Grigoryan, the preferred candidate? rhetorically asked Avetik Ishkhanyan, the chairman of the Helsinki Committee of Armenia, on his Facebook page. I dont think Sarkissian is so naïve, Ishkhanyan added, suggesting that the president was only playing democracy.

Reform of the courts has been high on Pashinyans agenda since he took power last year, and he renewed those calls after a judge released on bail former president Robert Kocharyan, who is charged in connection with the March 1 events. That case has been referred to the Constitutional Court, but Grigoryan has said he will stay out of that case.

After Kocharyan was released on bail, Pashinyan called on his supporters to protest at courts and for judges who know inside themselves that they cannot be impartial and objective to resign. The head of the Supreme Jurisdiction Council of Armenia, Gagik Harutyunyan, subsequently resigned. I no longer consider my work to be expedient, Harutyunyan said in his resignation letter.

On May 31, Pashinyan discussed judicial reforms with an EU delegation led by the director general of the Council of Europe Human Rights Secretariat, Christos Giakoumopoulos, who offered public support and offered his bodys expertise to the reform effort.

The problem is that by virtue of last years political developments, the Armenian courts dont have the peoples trust, unlike the government and parliament. That is why courts rulings keep causing specific concerns in society; people simply do not trust the judicial system, and this can be a source of crisis, Pashinyan said during the meeting.

https://eurasianet.org/government-ally-confirmed-to-armenias-constitutional-court

k/Source	