Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi is meeting Japanese Prime Minister Yoshihide Suga on Wednesday, marking Beijings first high-level contact with Japans new leader.

Wang met his Japanese counterpart Toshimitsu Motegi on Tuesday where they agreed to cooperate on trade and fighting the coronavirus, but maintained their stances on territorial disputes, including on the Senkaku islands, also known in China as Diaoyutai, leaving the thorny issue unresolved.

According to TV network NHK News, Motegi also urged China for more transparency about its policy in the far western region of Xinjiang, where the United Nations says about one million ethnic Uighur people have been detained in re-education camps that China says are vocational training centres.
