The U.K. is under strain and Boris Johnson wants to fix it with love.

The British prime minister will take his usual approach of aggressive optimism, and a heavy splash of cash, to counter the fast-growing pressures that threaten to crack the union apart. Scotland is again threatening to break free from Westminster. Violence — fueled in part by tensions over Brexit — has broken out in Northern Ireland. Even Wales is seeing a surge in nationalist support.

Johnson's solution: Project Love — according to Alister Jack, the U.K.'s secretary of state for Scotland and one of the three territorial ministers interviewed for this article.
