The European Councils decision to bypass Bosnia is both a disappointment and an opportunity to begin a debate about different options.

For almost two decades, European integration has been one of the dominant themes in public discourse in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Along with the 1992-5 war and its legacy, perhaps no other issue has featured as prominently in everyday lives. Ever since the Thessaloniki Summit of 2003, which offered a European perspective for the Western Balkans(*), Bosnia has been fixated on joining the EU.
