Cyberattackers believed to be from Iran have started publishing sensitive information from the border control authorities, including documents on alleged plots to kill Albanian and Kosovo politicians, while the prosecutor in Tirana has banned media from publishing any of the data.

Albania has been subject to a string of cyberattacks since 15 July that brought digital government systems to a standstill and saw a site called Homeland Security offer to sell reams of sensitive citizen and government data while threatening to publish more. Another followed this attack in September that brought all border computer systems offline, causing chaos at border crossings and airports.
