The imposition of an electoral law reform on election day in Bosnia threatens to undermine Bosnian democracy.

The results of Bosnia and Herzegovinas October 2 general election, the eighth since the conclusion of the 1992-1995 Bosnian War, saw the countrys citizens deliver shock defeats to segments of the ruling nationalist oligarchy.

Bosnian post-war politics have been dominated by a clique of nationalist parties which have maintained power by fomenting sectarian divisions, while presiding over vast patronage networks which helped further cement their grip on the populace. But after nearly three decades of growing social and economic stagnation and decay, Bosnian voters clearly delivered mandates to disparate coalition of reformist actors.
