Aliyev's offer of amnesty for Karabakh Armenians, contingent upon specific conditions, was once again rejected by the region's leaders, who also sought support from Russia against Azerbaijan

After the Second Karabakh War, a two-stage process continued in the name of normalization in the South Caucasus.

The first stage was the ongoing normalization process between Azerbaijan and Armenia, which is mostly directed toward the signing of the final peace agreement between the two countries, the demarcation and delimitation of their borders, and the opening of communication and transportation routes. The critical point in the negotiations for this was Armenias recognition of the territorial integrity of Azerbaijan, including its sovereignty over the Karabakh region.
