Turkmenistan does not see any political, economic, or financial factors hindering the construction of the Trans-Caspian gas pipeline, which could make a tangible contribution to energy security in Eurasia, Azernews reports.

This was stated in a statement of the Turkmen Foreign Ministry in connection with publications in foreign media concerning the possibilities of implementing the project of Turkmen's natural gas supplies to European markets.

"The idea of building the Trans-Caspian gas pipeline initiated by Turkmenistan was initially considered by our country not just as an economically and commercially sound project, but also as an essential component of diversification of energy flows as a key condition for global energy security and sustainability on the basis of equal consideration of the interests and benefits of producers, consumers, and transit countries. By the way, all potential participants of the project agree with this," the Foreign Ministry said.
