Yesterday, a mine explosion in the Gazakh region of Azerbaijan resulted in the injury of an employee of the State Border Service. It is worth noting that previously, in July 2020, Gazakh became a site for clashes with Armenia. Finally, in April of this year, Armenia and Azerbaijan reached an agreement whereby Armenia handed over four villages within Gazakh District to Azerbaijan. During these 4 years, the Armenian side tried to hinder the process by creating problems and wanted to gain time regarding the return of the 4 Azerbaijani villages.

The point is that although the mine explosion in the recently returned village of Gazakh raised similar suspicions, the different versions raised some questions as well. Currently, two issues raise questions: Is the mine explosion in Gazakh a coincidence, or did the Armenians lay mines in this region in a very short time?

And finally, the injury of an Azerbaijani military serviceman as a result of an explosion reflects the example of the next Armenian provocation.
