The recently held Iraqi Kurdish Regional Government (KRG) elections point toward a likely coalition between the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP), which retained its lead, and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK), which secured the second position.

Held on October 20 after a two-year delay, the elections saw the New Generation Movement and the Kurdistan Islamic Union Party (Yekgirtu) finish in third and fourth place, respectively. Once results are certified, the leading party will have 90 days to form a government, with coalition talks expected to begin shortly thereafter.
