This article is part of the Polish Presidency of the EU special report.

Nearly three years since Russian missiles began raining down across Ukraine, Europe is still buying vast quantities of Moscows oil and gas, helping fill the Kremlins war chest. Now, Poland wants to put the squeeze on those revenues.

Warsaw □ one of Kyivs closest allies □ hopes to use its turn at steering the European Unions policy agenda to shine a light on how much fuel the bloc is still importing and to drive a new crusade against imports of liquefied natural gas (LNG) and nuclear technology.
