Greeces unilateral actions display a blatant disregard for global maritime laws. The way out is through meaningful negotiations.

Greece recently announced two new national marine parks, one in the Ionian Sea and one in the Aegean, presenting them as important environmental initiatives. However, a closer look shows that this move is more of a calculated geopolitical manoeuvre than ecological stewardship.

Wrapped in appealing conservation language, the move aims to further long-held territorial goals, challenge the existing status quo in the Aegean, and unilaterally establish facts in areas with disputed sovereignty.
