Georgian Prime Minister Irakli Kobakhidze strongly criticized the United States and European countries for failing to condemn what he described as an attempted power seizure in the capital Tbilisi on October 4, saying their silence could be seen as a form of indirect support for those involved.

Speaking at a press briefing on Tuesday, Kobakhidze said, Over the past days, not a single organization or state – including the United States, the European Union, and certain EU member countries – that claim to comment on or advise Georgia about its internal affairs, have condemned the attempt to overthrow the elected government or the violent assault on the presidential palace.

He went on to accuse some Western institutions, such as the EU, OSCE/ODIHR, and others, of issuing statements in the opposite direction, adding that their refusal to denounce the events amounted to tacit approval.
