Russia is ready to work with Central Asian countries to build new logistics and transport chains, President Vladimir Putin said at the Central Asia-Russia summit in Dushanbe, Trend reports.

According to him, the key tasks are to develop the North-South and East-West trunk routes passing through the countries of the region, as well as to lay new transcontinental corridors.

Subsequently, all these and other Eurasian logistics projects could be combined into a single network with modern electronic services and transport services. This will allow us to increase the volume of international transport through our common region many times over, the head of state added.
