Greece's conservative government says the "Fair Work for All" legislation aims to make the labour market more flexible and effective.

Greece's parliament approved a bill on Thursday which allows employers in the private sector to extend the number of hours an employee can work, despite protests across the country from workers grappling with a cost-of-living crisis.

The bill, entitled "Fair Work for All," allows employers to extend the work day to 13 hours, up from the current eight.
