Climate change and the drought "threaten" Athens with water scarcity for the first time in 30 years. The emergency plan aims to avoid this.

Greece has just launched 11 billion worth of projects to implement its water management plan and tackle the growing threat of water scarcity.

Environment and Energy Minister Stavros Papastavrou announced the investment alongside Prime Minister Kyriakos Mitsotakis at the Athens Water Supply and Sewerage Company's (EYDAP) 100th anniversary event. They stressed that water would remain a public good and maintain its status as some of the highest quality in Europe.
