Germany and France have been trying to maintain a friendship since the 1960s – a friendship that is supposed to guide the rest of the continent. However, this doesn't really work anymore. Why do they struggle to find a united position on Donald Trump's ongoing threats? Could this lack of unity hamper Europe's response?

Germany and France. The two nations have been trying to maintain a friendship since the 1960s – a friendship that is supposed to guide the rest of the continent. The truth is, it doesn't really work anymore.

Why do they struggle to find a united position to Donald Trump's ongoing threats?
