Kazakh President Kassym-Jomart Tokayev announced on Tuesday that his country is abandoning its "super-presidential" form of governance.

Speaking at an extended government meeting in the capital Astana, Tokayev declared that Kazakhstan is transitioning into a presidential republic with an influential parliament.

"A panoramic look at the political reforms of recent years makes it clear that Kazakhstan is finally abandoning the super-presidential form of government, moving toward a presidential republic with an influential, authoritative parliament," he said.
