Nele ANDERS

The political centre can agree on almost nothing, while the far-right rallies behind a shared line: opposition to the mainstream, challenging elites, Brussels and the political establishment.

Yet this unity unravels when the debate shifts from domestic grievances on migration and climate change denial to foreign policy.

Nowhere is this clearer than in their response to the US-Israeli war of choice in Iran. Far-right parties across Europe are divided – both internally and among themselves – over how to respond to the US-Israeli war of choice in Iran – and so are their voters.
