Kazakhstan said on Tuesday that oil exports through the Caspian Pipeline Consortium (CPC) are stable amid Russian claims that Ukraine struck the consortiums infrastructure at the Black Sea port of Novorossiysk.

According to my colleagues, our oil operations in all directions are stable from this block, and exports via the CPC continue steadily, Deputy Energy Minister Sungat Yesimkhanov told reporters at a government briefing, according to the Kazinform news agency.

Yesimkhanovs remarks come a day after Russia claimed that Ukraine damaged oil infrastructure at CPC terminal in Novorossiysk in an overnight drone attack, claiming the attack sought to destabilize the global hydrocarbon market and disrupt oil product supplies to European consumers.
