Representatives of the five Central Asian states – Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, and Turkmenistan – along with Azerbaijan, are expected in New York for the United Nations General Assembly in September.

Historically, meetings between the Central Asian states and the United States – the C5+1 – have taken place on the sidelines of the United Nations. It is the most natural and logistically efficient venue for President Donald Trump to re-engage with the C5 partners he hosted at the White House last November.

As of now, only foreign ministers are expected to attend the UNGA. But this could change if Trump extends an invitation to the leaders, according to a Central Asian diplomatic source.
