New production will come too late, U.S. supplies are strained and leading donors say they have few interceptors to spare.

Europe is scrambling for more Patriot interceptors to donate to an increasingly desperate Ukraine, which is racing to reinforce its ballistic missile defenses before Russias expected winter assault.

Kyiv is seeking hundreds of interceptors, but new production will come too late, the war with Iran has strained U.S. supplies, and several of Ukraines leading European backers say they have few left that they can safely donate.
