Armenia has been a very important topic for Russia [1] Union relations. Armenia is one of the countries included in the European Union Eastern Partnership program, as well as one that joined the Eurasian Union – an initiative launched by Russian Federation.

In terms of economic relations, despite sanctions implemented against Russia, as well as the crisis with Russian ruble and declining oil prices that has created problems for Eurasian Union member countries,[1] Russian investments in Armenia constitute a major backup for keeping Armenian economy alive and boosting economic developments. Russian companies (and therefore Russia) invested in vital sectors such as telecommunications, energy, and mining. Some scholars, having a realist perspective, are trying to explain Armenias policy change in terms of security and economic concerns, but we should keep in mind the fact that until the day Armenian President Sargysan declared Armenias choice to join the customs union of the Eurasian Union, the EU was expecting Armenia to proceed with EU integration and sign the Association Agreement. Now, because of technical details, having further integration with EU markets is off the table. EU, being aware of the effects of the crisis with Russia over the former Soviet Union region, decided to change EUs Eastern Partnership framework and adopt more flexible rules which will take the regional/domestic dynamics into account. Neighbourhood Commissioner Johannes Hahn stated: We are currently consulting widely on the way ahead for this policy with a view to developing more effective ways of working with these key partners for the benefit of the EU and our neighbours themselves.[2] It might be even possible to say that Armenia will benefit from this change of policy. It will give Armenia the chance to pursue cooperation with EU on sectorial level, particularly energy, as well as on political level, human rights issues and democratic progress even though Armenia preferred to join the Eurasian Union. As such, Armenia will have the chance to benefit from EU funds and consultancy on different levels while at the same time deepening relations with Eurasian Union members. For instance, a recent report published by the European Commission on Armenia states that the EU is not pleased with the progress

Armenia has so far made.[3] The Report states that Armenia has to work particularly on democracy, human rights and judiciary reforms.[4] However, considering the current convergence with Russia, Armenia might have limited room for maneuvering to implement independent policies. So, the real question here is whatever EU does, will Armenia be able to implement its advice? To put it another way, will it be up to Armenias will to take EUs suggestions and reports into account?

This message was important in terms of understanding the regional dimensions as well as Armenias unstable foreign policy based on a fragmented structure of political tendencies, dependencies, and preferences on the domestic level. This might create an impact on the regional level as well.

We should keep in mind Armenias perceptions about the role of Russia in the region. Even though Armenia cooperates with NATO and contributes in NATO Missions; Russia remains as its main ally. Armenia is the only country in the South Caucasus hosting a Russian military base within its territories (Gyumri), and it has been a member of the Collective Security Treaty Organization[5] (CSTO) since 2002, and it most recently decided to join the Eurasian Union. We can clearly see that Russia has a dominant influence over Armenia. Especially because of Armenias increasing dependency on Russia, this influence is expected to increase even more in the future.

Armenias main concerns are the conflict over Nagorno-Karabakh - a land occupied by Armenia - and closed borders with Turkey, which were closed as a reaction of the occupation of Nagorno-Karabakh and surrounding districts.[6] Foreign Minister of Russia Sergey Lavrov clarified the position of Russia on Nagorno-Karabakh, stating that "I am sure that despite military rhetoric, none of the parties want it. All our steps for the settlement of the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict are aimed at finding as soon as possible a mutually acceptable peace formula," at a joint news conference with Foreign Minister of Armenia Edward Nalbandian.[7] Yet, Russia adopts a sharper position on the Armenia-Turkey relations. Putin declared that he will attend the commemoration on the events of 1915 that will be held in Yerevan on 24th of April, 2015. Despite the good relations between Russia and Turkey, such as new Turkish Stream pipeline project, President Putin made his position clear on a very sensitive issue for Turkey. But considering Russias policies in the region, it is obvious that Russia remains as the main guarantor of Armenias security. Armenia followed this path at the expense of being isolated and excluded in the region.

After a Russian soldier from the Gyumri base killed an entire Armenian family, where the Russian base is located, this security perception and the role of Russia in Armenia (in the South Caucasus from a broader perspective) has been challenged as well. Different voices have been raised in Armenia on the Armenia-Russian Federation relations.[8] However, Russia has continued to strengthen its military existence and power in the South Caucasus. Recently, Russian pilots exercised large-scale military drills in Armenian airspace. According to press, the Southern Military District of Russian Federation spokesman said that "The maneuvers involve more than 100 troops of flight and service personnel of the force grouping and more than 30 units of special military and aircraft equipment * [9] Moreover, under CSTO, member countries conducted exercises simulating possible reactions to any threat coming from ISIS. According the news, The exercise included the simulation of ISIS militant activities in non-existent CSTO member states. [10] Russia gives a strong message to the international community: Russia is determined to hold onto its dominant role in the South Caucasus. Actually, Russia gave such signals when it agreed with Armenia to keep the military base operational until 2044.

Other important developments on the political and diplomatic relations are also worth mentioning. On 7th of April, Armenias Foreign Minister Edward Nalbandian paid a visit to Moscow to discuss further cooperation between Armenia and Russia. They discussed Armenias integration to Eurasia Union, cooperation of two actors on the international level and Nagorno-Karabakh peace process. According to the FM press release of Russia The ministers spoke in favour of continuing the active use of the ministerial consultations mechanism and strengthening coordination, including in the framework of the UN, CIS, CSTO, OSCE, BSEC and other multilateral forums. [11] Hence, Armenia declares that foreign policy agenda will be determined in accordance with the outcomes of their consultations with Russia. Armenia will no longer be able to adopt independent foreign policies, even if this is not openly stated this dependency will directly affect its relations both with EU and NATO as well.

Increasing influence of Russia has raised concerns in the US Congress. Mr. Darrell Issa, a US Congressman, expressed his view over this issue at a public hearing, stating that Todays hearing is important, but it is not new. We will say a great many things, but very few of them will be new. Certainly, questions about Armenias banking relationship with Iran, authorized, pushed prodded and cajoled by Russia is new and concerning * [] look forward to questions, particularly questions about Russias involvement through Armenia in the backdoor circumvention of the sanctions that are in place today. [12] Similarly, Dan Burton, a former Congressman, draw attention to the same issue. He mainly focused on the relations between Armenia and Iran, but added the role of Russia in the region. [13] According to news, Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif sees Armenias decision to be a member of Eurasian as a positive development. For Iran, this will help to broader cooperation options to Iran, Armenia and Russia. [14] Congressman Burton also stated that * [] Irans ambassador to Moscow, Mehdi Sanai, said that Tehran will seriously look at signing a memorandum of understanding on trade with the EEU. In fact, Sanai has publicly envisioned Iranian-Russian trade jumping from the present annual $3-5 billion to $70 billion. [15] Considering the routes of the Southern Armenia Railway, Armenia will play a role as a hub between Iran and Russia. Therefore Russia will have chance to find a link with Iran, increase its influence even more and in return Iran will have a direct access to the Black Sea region via transportation corridors. Particularly considering the sanctions implemented against Russia and Russias efforts to create new markets for its products, Mr. Issas and Mr. Burtons concerns should be taken seriously.

Considering EUs efforts to keep Armenia still on track (in terms of democratization and cooperating with EU) and Armenias limited process, Mr. Issas concerns he raised at the US Congress, latest developments on the military and economic areas, the international community should re-think (first, Armenias u-turn and going ahead with Eurasian Union, and second getting closer with Russia on many different levels) about sincerity of Armenias governments when it comes to relations with Euro-Atlantic region.
