

RELIGIOUS POLARIZATION IN LINE WITH DEMOGRAPHIC CHANGES AND ITS EFFECT ON POLITICS

AVİM

According to research done by Pew Research Center, in 2050, the demographic structure of the world will change considerably compared to today. This research predicts that the number of people who do not affiliate with any religion will decrease, whereas the number of Muslims and Christians will be nearly equal.[1] In this regard, if demographic changes proceed as predicted, a bipolar system with Christianity and Islam as the two dominant religions will emerge in 2050.

In accordance with these demographic changes, statements especially by Christian clergymen reveal that these possible changes has led the Christian world to unite and cooperate within itself on many historical and political issues. In other words, in the face of this demographic change, the Christian world embarked on a quest for solidarity and consolidation among itself. The latest and most concrete example of this is the meeting of the Orthodox Council in Crete in the previous weeks, which was last gathered in 843 in iznik, as a result of the Orthodox Churches putting aside their disagreements. Also, besides discussions on religious doctrines, the necessity and importance of the unity of the Christian world was emphasized in this meeting. Although Patriarch Kirill, the spiritual leader of Russian Orthodox Church, did not attend the meeting due to some disagreements, his statement the Crete gathering is a preparatory session for a synod that will unite all the Churches without exception[2] points out the importance of this Council.

Another indicator of cooperation among the Christian world is the meeting between Pope Francis and Patriarch Kirill, the spiritual leaders of the Roman Catholic Church and Russian Orthodox Church that have been separated for centuries. Following their meeting, both leaders stated that they, as co-religionists, discussed about the problems of Christians in the world and vital topics about future of humanity.[3] In other words, both leaders, issuing a joint declaration, pointed out the problems of Christian minorities in different geographies, and decided the two churches that had disagreements for centuries to act together on several major issues. In addition, mentioning the sadness over the loss of [Christian] unity, the outcome of human weakness and of sin, they emphasized the importance and necessity of solidarity among Christians. In brief, as it is understood from statements of the two spiritual leaders, the Christian world, which has been separated for centuries, is trying to unite.

Besides this meeting between the two leaders, Pope Francis of the Roman Catholic Church also took other various steps to unite Christian world, which is, according to him, unable to cope with problems and evil. Within this context, Pope Francis visit to Armenia on 24th -26th June is very important, as he and Karekin II of the Armenian Apostolic Church made joint statements in line with his drive for ecumenism. In their joint declaration, both leaders expressed their desire for the enhancement of relations between the two churches that would be followed by full unity, despite several divisions among the Christian world.[4] Previously, similar messages of solidarity were expressed when Pope Francis held meetings with Bartholomew I of the Greek Patriarchate of Istanbul.

In fact, the founding purpose of the World Council of Churches, which is the largest association of Christian churches, is to forge ecumenism (solidarity and unity amongst Christians). In connection with this, all efforts of the Council are aimed at ensuring effective cooperation and eliminating disagreements among Christian churches.

All of these show that the Christian world is working towards unity in order to eliminate the divisions among them. The main purpose of this unity is to ensure that the Christian world will act together as one bloc in 2050. Demographic projections with regard to the year 2050 plays a crucial role in the accelerated attempts to eliminate centuries-old divisions within Christianity, which is currently the worlds largest religion. However, several statements made in accordance with mutual interests has the potential to lead to disputes in terms of its effects on daily politics. One of the most important example of this pertains to Turkey. For instance, harassing Turkey has become one of the most preferred methods when discussing about downtrodden peoples in the Christian world and the necessity and importance of unity for the purpose of ecumenism. Various churches and their associations resort to the genocide narrative regarding the 1915 events without questioning it, and in fact, this narrative is latched onto the most by Pope Francis and the World Council of Churches. World Council of Churches has issued several statements highlighting the genocide narrative on the 1915 events. In one of such statements, the World Council of Churches indicated that genocide was the appropriate term to use for the 1915 events and that they would support Armenians accordingly. Furthermore, since 1983, the World Council of Churches has engaged in various activities related to the recognition and propagation of the so-called Armenian genocide, and, in fact, has declared its dissatisfaction with the verdict of the Perincek v. Switzerland case seen at the European Court of Human Rights.[5] Besides the Council, Pope Francis also has propagated the genocide narrative by repeating the inaccuracies and clichés of this narrative. In response to this, officials from the Armenian Apostolic Church, although they belong to different Christian denominations, publicly has expressed their love and support for the Pope.[6] However what is important is the fact that efforts and statements by Christians with the purpose of eliminating centuries-old divisions and uniting all Christian have the potential to give rise to prejudices against Muslims, especially against Turks, in Europe and other parts of the world.

To sum up, if global demographic changes proceed as projected by Pew Research Center, in 2050, the number of Christians and Muslims will be nearly equal. In this regard, the Christian World Christian world is engaged in many activities in order to both eliminate divisions among themselves and to unite in accordance with changing demographics. Even though this is a positive development for the Christian world, one-sided statements on politics and history can lead to misunderstandings and prejudices. To be more precise, Christian Worlds aim of unity, its constant mention of past and present troubles and its efforts to resolve them by virtue of belonging to the same faith are understandable behaviours. However, what is problematic is the fact that, despite constant mention of Christian sufferings, the sufferings of Muslims are not mentioned and are even ignored. Especially the events of 1915 is a case in point; although Pope Francis and World Council of Churches always mention the sufferings of Armenians, they never speak, in the same vein, of the fact that Muslims, who were under the same conditions in that period, had also suffered severely and lost their lives. Unfortunately, this attitude increases the bias and indifference towards Turks and Muslims in the world, especially in Europe. Furthermore, the fact that Christian churches, which strive for the identification Christianity with modern values, have teachings exclusive of secularism, and the fact that they give the impression that they take advantage of the rising Islamophobia, let alone oppose it, do not create optimism for the future.
